

Secret gold deposits

Whether China or even Russia declare their gold reserves in the actual amount is questionable.

Thus, it is suspected that the two countries are preparing to turn their backs on the U.S. dollar system. A system in which gold has a predominant position could be the goal. Many major central banks have sold dollars while increasing gold reserves. Currency devaluation and inflation, which is no longer under control, as well as the enormous national debt, could eventually take their toll. In the process, inflation could be much higher than depicted. Global debt adds up to around $300 trillion. Rising interest rates could lead to major dislocations. Cranking up the money printing machine will not help.

The one constant that no one can simply print and multiply is gold. Now gold is stuck between an aggressive Fed and fears of stalled inflation. But despite the strong volatility of assets other than gold, the price of gold is proving quite stable. That's because gold continues to benefit from safe-haven demand due to heightened geopolitical risks and concerns about lower equity markets. And this could have a stronger impact than concerns about higher interest rates. Similarly, awakening physical gold demand could strengthen gold prices. For example, India's gold imports recovered in May, and demand in China at least has not deteriorated further despite the lockdown. Swiss trade data also reinforce this trend. For private investors, a gold investment to stabilize the portfolio is advisable, for example with the values of Osisko Gold Royalties or Golden Rim Resources.
