

Improved sentiment on the gold market - higher precious metal prices

Precious metal prices are trending well. Higher gold prices should also have an impact on white metals.

Analysts expect a gold rally because investors' interest in precious metals is expected to revive. This will also have a positive impact on the rest of the precious metals. And a gold rally should be on the cards if the US yield curve turns bullish and the Fed decides to ease. The Covid pandemic and politicians' fight against inflation have dampened investor sentiment for precious metals. The recent positive real yields, which have risen to their highest level in more than ten years, have also contributed to this. If politics changes, investor interest will also change, and in a positive way for precious metals. And that time will come. New highs in the gold price over the next two years could be the result.

Especially if the US economy drifts into recession, key interest rates are lowered and real yields on US government bonds fall. Demand for silver is expected to remain healthy due to its increasing use in the energy transition. There are also numerous advocates for strong platinum price forecasts, even if this still requires some patience. The price of palladium is still on a downward trend, but if the price of gold has a positive impact on the white metals, palladium could also start to rise again. In previous phases of interest rate hikes, it took around six months for interest rates to be lowered. Precious metal investors should therefore be patient and take advantage of price setbacks.
