

The greed for gold

Even in mythology there was greed for gold. Today, Germans are among those who hoard the most gold. Security is the idea behind it.

In Germanic mythology, the goddess Gullveig brought the greed for gold upon the gods. The gods demanded the secret of where the source of wealth was located. Eventually, Gullveig was banished, and a war broke out. Germans are particularly fond of gold today. According to a survey, there were almost 9,100 tons of gold in private households in 2021. The German Bundesbank lags far behind, owning only about 3,360 tons of gold. The reason for the large amount of private gold in this country is the Germans' inherent need for security. Because worries and fears about the future are looking for a way out, and thus for gold ownership.

Banks and states also strive for hedging and security and buy gold. In 1971, the gold standard ended. Since then, the U.S. dollar has no longer been tied to the national gold supply. And gold continues to be in the great interest of banks and states. Incidentally, one third of German gold owners store their gold treasure at home. A safe deposit box in a bank would probably be a better idea. Gold ownership bans as well as restrictions have existed since ancient times and not only in dictatorships but also in democracies. In more than 120 countries restrictions 1973 were still given in the year. However, most of them also came to an end with the end of the gold standard or with the collapse of the Eastern bloc.

Today, investors can bet on gold not only with physical gold, but also with leverage on the gold price with shares of gold companies.

One option would be Vizsla Silver - <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=h-Pc6tkcRAs> -, whose formerly producing Panuco property in Mexico contains high-grade gold and silver.

Tudor Gold - <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=M1tQxkYRgu4> - owns the Treaty Creek project in British Columbia's Golden Triangle, with nearly 18,000 hectares of land.
